

A&P Group has been investing in the future of our business by offering first class apprenticeships since 2008.

As a company we are committed to recruiting 20 apprentices a year across our three sites, with apprenticeships offered in a range of trades, including engineering, welding, procurement and health and safety.

Samantha Murphy is one of our newest apprentices, having started her training in fabrication and welding at A&P Tyne last September. With over three years left as an apprentice, Sam is looking forward to completing her training and is enjoying the challenges it brings.

“I chose an apprenticeship at A&P because the job and the course caught my interest when I was looking for an apprenticeship,” she said. “I enjoy working hands on with real jobs, supervised by more experienced workers who help me with any aspect of the job.

“The staff are all very supportive and easy to talk to about any problems or worries, making it a nice environment to work in. I would certainly encourage others to join the apprenticeship scheme as it gives you real work experience and education and you gain a qualification at the end of it.”
